What folly it is to speak of equalizing the sexes! Of opening every field of activity to woman! She is not destined by nature or by religion to be the equal of mun, or to de those ruder tasks from which God has saved her by making her not an equal, but a queen, with queenly dignity and queenly power and queenly dignity and queenly power and queenly privileges.

Not the equality of woman with man, but the maintenance in her of the real causes of her dignity and superiority must be the ideal of those who would have God's all-wise plan find its full fruition. She must be carefully insined to keep alive her love for all that is true and good and beautiful in life. Her virtue is the keystone of society, her sense of duty and honer and right is reflected in every home; her uncelfishness and devotion and correctives of view are our safeguard against Desp of view are our safeguard against the social shipwreek. She must have bee highest yearnings encouraged and stimulated, her vision must be purified and elevated, she above all human belogs, must be taught that to listen only to the soul's cry for physical happiness and comfort, or for mere knowledge, is to debase her to tear the crown from her brow, and drag her into the beginning conflict where virtue and honor and soul-beauty are words of little possible.

It is the great glory of Trinity college that at a time when the soul's most togent needs are exposed to general forgertuiness, she has assured woman urgent needs are exposed to general forgetfulness, she has assured woman of hulumness which will lead infallibly to all that is best and most desirable in womanly life and character; and the great consolation of her graduates must be that while others have to hear what a colocal should be they can be told what their school is. Here is a pleasant, shelter in the desent of modern life where souls are refreshed and strength-sued by the waters of wisdom as well as those of knowledge; where each moment brings its high inspiration and its nobler impulse, and where each day marks a growth from power to power, an approximation to the divine ideal on which resits the approving judgment of God and man. Here all high desires find their fulfillment; here, in answer to your prayers, you receive in its fullness the spirit of wisdom. Here moderly and virtue, unselfishness and heroto human respect or to the unreliable development of an aesthetic sense of right, but are made the prime, explicit chiect of the endeavers of both teachers and students. Here the young soul of wances in "wisdom and age and grace with God and man."

ces McDevitt of Altrest and Bridgest avances in "wisdom and age and grace with God and man."

As you who are about to go forth from the college look back today on the pleasant year you have spent in this 'garden set apart.' Your hearts, I am sure, are moved most at the thought of your growth in goodness of soul and the clearer vision that has come to you of the really a strable things of life. You have learned much from books; you have learned much from books; you have learned much from books; you understanding, you have prayed, and there has been given to you understanding, you have prayed, and there has come to you through open, tangible influences, the speken word, the august mysteries of religion, the continual association with souls pure and highunded, perhaps most of all from the eloquent example of teachers irreveably devoted to overy high womanly virtue and example of teachers irreveably devoted to overy high womanly virtue and example felt but not defined, subtle and constant, a part of the atmosphere and life here, to which all unworthiness was foreign. You could not but grow and service and subtle and constant, a part of the atmosphere and life here, to which all unworthiness was foreign. You could not but grow and service and subtle and constant, a part of the atmosphere and life here, to which all unworthiness was foreign. You could not but grow and service and subtle and constant, a part of the atmosphere and life here, to which all unworthiness was foreign. You could not but grow and service and subtle and constant, a part of the atmosphere and life here, to which all unworthiness was foreign. You could not but grow and service and stand a part of the all unworthiness was foreign. You could not but grow amid such autroundings; you could not but come to know that there is a light brighter and more inextinguishable thin the torch of learning, that there are things more precious than health and beauty; things in comparison with which all gold is as a little sand and aliver shall be counted as clay. You have learned, too, a lesson which will be brought home to you more vivility in after life, that all things come together with wisdom and innumerable riches through her hands; that there is no repoicing like unto that of the soul riches through her hands; that there is no rejoicing like unto that of the soul conscious of growth and emancipation. Dincult as may be at times our attempt to correspond with the nobler promptings of our being, there is no other cad-aver which brings greater conflort and happiness to the soul; there is none followed by so much joy and gladness of heart; no too, it and gladness of heart; no too, it must be said, which girt much and guidness of heart; no too, it must be said, which giv much meaning and comfort and as to our temporal life. The same ideal that a noble life, and conduct removed that a noble life, and conduct removed praceful and hely by purer qualities of heart and soul are objects of contempt. Men look with veneration on a good woman; God thesses and consoles her her life is the most perfect and fullest even from a worldly point of view. She rejulees the home, she blesses society, she wards off evil; she is in the truest sense a great, purifying, strengthening force on whom nations may well look as a most powerful help and a tower of strength. Hammers and love and service become her life, as natural as a discontent and just and selfishness to other. She fights " to others. She fights without knowing it in the front rank of the great builde or rightcoursess; she makes humarify her debtor; she brings close to man the great ideal of life for which we must

The last words of your Alma Mater, as she bids you God-speed, must remind you that your opportunities have made you debtors to this college, to yourselves and to humanity. Here, she mays to the world, are those whom I have given the highest ideals of conduct and character, by whose lives I may be judged. Here are women with noble womanity hearts and high womanity wouls. They have shared with so many others the delights of learning and now receive the academic rewards of their diligence and labor. But they are more than my scholars, my students: the cereive the scademic rewards of their diligence and labor. But they are more than my scholars, my students; they are my children and I have expended upon them all a mother's care and all a mother's care and all a mother's love. I have been solichous that they should be virtuous as well as learned, versed in the mysteries of science, but acquainted also with the profounder severs of noble living. My purpose has been to make them worthy inheritors of the exalted traditions of Catholic womanhood, prompt in faith and love, in devotion and sacrifice, able to find meaning and value in the lowest as well as in the highest service of man and God. From their ranks will come none to swell the lists of those who menace and defile the sanctity of marriage; from their lips will fall no flippant insult to things sacred and saving; they will be guilty of no irreverence against nature or nature's God; they will not veil under a decorous exterior unholy hopes and deadened hearts. Faithful to their high discipline, they will defluse sweetness and the light of virtuous ideal and noble and heroic develon; they will be generous in their service of every great cause; they will be a salutary leaven in society. The freshness and beauty of their lives will neurish the sacred flame of womanly honor, the hope and sustenance of the world; wherever they go, livey will recall to their sisters the fairest type of womanhood, and stir all hearts with renewed yearnings for those more percious goods which give value to all life, and which along give to womanly life its grace and diguity and giery.

"There is no need to worry. When

"There is no need to worry. When God shuts a door he opens a windaw." A world of sunshine and hope is epitomized in this Italian proverb.
